

NIO POLICY EQUALITY SCREENING FORM

1. Title of policy

Introducing custodial sanctions for offences committed under section 55 of the Data Protection Act 1998

2. Brief description of policy. Do any other policies interact with this policy?

Section 55 of the DPA makes it an offence to unlawfully obtain, disclose or procure personal data and selling or offering to sell personal data obtained in those circumstances. Currently the maximum penalty available is an unlimited fine.

The review of penalties is in response to the Information Commissioner's Office request following their monitoring of the illegal trade in personal data. The Information Commissioner called to introduce custodial sentences for those who seek to profit from the illegal trade in personal data and for those who knowingly or recklessly disclose personal data to those who have no right to it.

The consultation also seeks views on the introduction a new defence, which has not yet been commenced, for anyone who can show that they acted for the purpose of journalism, art or literature with a view of publishing material in the reasonable belief that the obtaining, disclosing and procuring the information was in the public's interest.

The consultation exercise seeks views on proposals to:

- Introduce increased maximum penalties available to the courts for those guilty of offences under section 55 of the DPA 1998.
- Commence of new defence in relation to journalistic, artistic or literary use of personal data in the interest of the public.

3. Aims of policy

To provide public reassurance that the government will take the appropriate action to protect people from crime and uphold the individual's right to an appropriate degree of protection for their personal data.

To deter more effectively the knowing or reckless misuse of personal data, including the illegal trade in personal information.

It also consults on the commencement a new defence in relation to journalistic, artistic or literary use of personal data in the interest of the public. This is to prevent the curtailing of legitimate and responsible journalism.

PART I

4. Who is responsible for devising and delivering the policy?

This is a Ministry of Justice consultation that is being delivered in parallel with the Northern Ireland Office as it is a UK wide policy.

5. Are there any linkages to NI Departments or NDPBs in relation to this policy/legislation? How are these interfaces managed?

Any changes to the policy on fine default will have implications across a range of criminal justice interests including:-

Northern Ireland Prison Service
Northern Ireland Court Service
The Judiciary
The Legal profession

These bodies and agencies will be consulted on the future development of any proposals.

6. Who is the policy/legislation likely to impact upon? What data is available to facilitate the screening exercise?

Impact:

Any changes introduced to section 55 of the DPA will have an impact upon individuals who knowingly or recklessly misuse personal data, including the illegal trade in personal information. The proposals would have an impact on the prison service if custodial sentences are subsequently passed for those found guilty of offences committed under section 55 of the DPA. There would also be a potential impact on the work of the courts.

Data:

For the years 2004 to 2006 three individuals were charged in NI for offences under this section. Two resulted in fines and one was issued a conditional discharge.

Another consultation "Increasing penalties for deliberate and wilful misuse of personal data" conducted by the Home Office and the NIO from 24th July till 30th October 2006.

7. Who will implement the policy?

The Judiciary, the Northern Ireland Court Service and the Northern Ireland Prison Service will implement appropriate and relevant aspects of the policies that are developed.

These proposals will affect anyone who participates in the illegal trade in personal data. Under the proposals, if they are convicted of a section 55 offence they may be liable to a custodial sentence, as well as the fines currently available. The previous responses to a consultation on this issue did not identify any impact of the proposal on any groups under consideration. There is equally no suggestion that prosecutions made under section 55 of the DPA fall along lines of race, gender, disability, age, dependent responsibilities, religion, political opinion, marital status or sexual orientation.
